So. It's been a week. As the world turns upside down because of COVID-19, we've been trying to keep grounded through what we know best: whisky. We're continuing to compile resources for connecting over a dram even while social distancing, along with content that we hope you'll find entertaining, useful, or just downright fun during this period of uncertainty and isolation. We'll continue to serve and support you, our readers, as best we can, remembering that even when separated from each other, whisky friendships will persevere.

And today, that means bringing you news about the latest releases. First up is an age-stated Canadian whisky. Benjamin Chapman 7 year old is a blend of rye and wheat whiskies, launching widely and priced at $39.

BENJAMIN CHAPMAN 7 YEAR OLD

Style: Blended whisky

Sourced from Canada, this blend is comprised of 51% 10 year old rye aged in first-fill bourbon barrels and 49% wheat whisky aged in used American whiskey barrels.

Whisky Advocate says:

While hardly a week passes that there's not a new scotch, Irish, or American whiskey release, new whiskies from Canada seem to be in short supply these days. So it's exciting to see a new Canadian blend, with an age statement, hitting shelves. We look forward to bringing you a review soon!
