When everything around gets bored and I want something new, I usually go to travel to Europe or Asia. At worst, to Latin America. Haha, of course not! It was all a long time ago, a few months ago. Now, at the very thought of sitting on an airplane wearing a mask, I start to choke, and the prospect of taking tests and possible quarantine instead of excursions and entertainment completely discourages travel, so you have to look for surprises without leaving your home.

It's good that there are people who tirelessly invent something new and interesting for the benefit of all of us, involuntary couch potatoes.

Let's start with wine. I'm not talking about the statistical fact that its consumption increases during quarantine. My point is that good wines seem even better when you are locked up at home. Especially local, new vintage, screw caps such as the Tree Fort collection recently launched by California-based 3 Badge Beverage Corporation .

I must admit that, despite the solid experience of consuming good wines, I have not learned how to use the corkscrew correctly. Probably because I usually do not drink alone and almost always there is either a polite gentleman or an experienced lady nearby to dashingly, with one turn of the wrist, fetch the cork from the bottle.

Tree Fort wines call for a picnic, communion with nature and allow even such inept people like me to simply unscrew the tin lid and pour fresh young wine into glasses (or paper cups).
